Judith Barry

All the light that's ours to see

19.09. - 22.11.2020

Judith Barry has a research-based art practice that spans a range of media and disciplines, including installation, architecture/exhibition design, film/video, performance and dance, sculpture, photography, and digital media. Her exhibition at Lumiar Cité constitutes the international premiere of a two-channel immersive installation.

All the light that's ours to see is an elegiac meditation on our changing viewing habits and how we are being transformed by the evolving forms of media surrounding us. The displacement of Mr. Kim's infamous New York video stores and his quest to find a home for his 55,000 films is the catalyst for this two-channel installation that explores how architecture, the long history of technological inventions, as well as art and media histories have affected us and the ways in which we engage with media, and by extension with each other.

The emergence of home video saw a metamorphosis in audience viewing conventions that departed from the collective cinematic tradition – where the experience of watching with others in the dark, seated next to strangers is an integral part of this process – and began to form its own uses for new typologies of social space (video games, social media, and home surveillance), radically altering our notions of shared collective engagement by revolutionising it through the spatialisation of unforeseen forms of digital and online media.

Visually, this project is a palimpsest of images presented across two screens that cinematically interrogates viewing spaces from the medieval period to present-day media environments. The physical array of the cinematic surround and its location-specific installation allows the viewer to slip between these historical moments and question the changing social situations they have encouraged, alongside the relationships among lost media histories, and ever-evolving emerging audience behaviours.

Judith Barry lives and works in New York. She has exhibited internationally and participated in numerous exhibitions, including the Berlin Biennale, CAFA Triennial, Carnegie International, Documenta, Nagoya Biennale, São Paulo Biennale, Sharjah Biennial, Sydney Biennale, Venice Biennale(s) of Art and Architecture, and the Whitney Biennale. A survey of her work travelled in Europe and was shown at the Berardo Museum, Lisbon, in 2010. Public Fantasy, a collection of Barry's essays, was published by the ICA in London (1991). Other publications include Projections: mise en abyme (1997), The Study for the Mirror and Garden (2003) and Judith Barry: body without limits (2009). Her awards include the Kiesler Prize for Architecture and the Arts, (2000) and the Best Pavilion and Audience Award at the 8th Cairo Biennale (2001). Currently, she is Director and Professor of the MIT Program in Art, Culture and Technology Cambridge, MA.

The exhibition was designed by the US architect Ken Saylor.
